

What Are Pheromones And The things they Do

Fact that seems to get overlooked all too often is that we humans are animals. It's due to this that we are subject to conduct themselves within animalistic methods at least some of the time. Our physical evolution has not taken all of us that far from the trees and shrubs and that's why pheromones are still a strong factor in helping us perform. It's this as well as other 'instincts' that are enabling us homo sapiens to be able to continue mating.

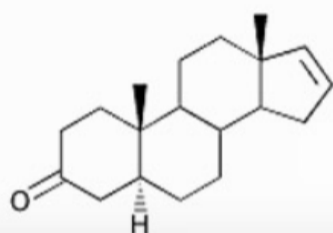

Luckily We are Still Able to Court Each Other and Go Through the Age Old Mating Rituals

The truth is though that most of us have no idea how we are reaching what we should achieve. Ok, so think about how a dog knows that another is in heat without being able to see the other dog. It is to do with airborne particles that are floating around and are picked up by the nose.

- Humans remain capable of picking up on these types of particles but since the social etiquette provides evolved.
- As a result, we control the reactions when we find someone desirable.
- Our capability to determine regardless of whether someone is attractive via odor remains with us.
- Humans even now key through their own sweat, a particle that tells the opposite gender that we are an attractive companion and will be ready to mate.

At the End, a Group of Women Were Asked to Sniff the Underarms of the Subjects

They were told to rate each from one to five with the most alluring being five and the least sexy getting one. Nearly all the results varied the particular roughly the a similar amount aside from one exactly where all the women rated the man four or over.

- This was a perfect example of the women to be able to choose the best partner through the use of their nose.
- They then had to find a way to be able to verify these results against something other than smell.
- More tests have been carried out and they found that the man who had been picked as the sexiest in the smell test has been a lot more handsome also.
- They tested the face for balance as well as other factor that made men desirable.
- So they'd proved that we still have a use for pheromones within our mating designs.
